

CHAS'S ROCK'N' ROLL ALLOTMENT

REMEMBER that butternut squash I rescued from the snail gits on the hill some months ago? Well it's let me down badly. It's snaked its way all around my allotment and in and out the lettuces and spinach and all, without producing one baby.

That's the thanks I get for providing it with a nice new, snail-free home. While its poor neighbours the courgette and ridge cucumber got mildew and bit the dust, it strutted about looking well healthy.

It don't give a monkeys about bearing fruit, it just beefs its way about pleasing itself and I swear it was sticking two stalks up at me the other evening. My beetroot has never treated me like that. It wouldn't, it's not in its nature. In fact nothing I've ever grown would. Everything has always been thankful for the extra food and water I have provided and I have been rewarded with fine fat onions, slender, tender beans, sparkling spinach and crispy lettuce in abundance.

'Pickled red cabbage beats the shop stuff'

Along the way I know, too, how much they have appreciated me plucking weeds from around their feet letting the air get to their toes. But not the butternut squash. Don't give a monkeys about weeds. It just barges around pushing 'em out the way as it goes. Gotta be some 24ft long at least and getting longer. Expecting it to rise up in the sky any minute and a giant to climb down. Then I'll get the old woman out with the axe.

Do you like pickled red cabbage? It's well easy to do your own and of course beats the shop stuff hands down. If you haven't grown any, (I haven't) get one from the supermarket. Chop it up as fine or as coarse as you would like it, give it a good rinse and drain it off. Don't bother to salt it if like me you eat it with everything and it gets eaten quick. It's lovely with egg and bacon. Anyway, stuff it in jars and top up with pickling vinegar, or I prefer plain malt vinegar with a little home-made muslin bag of pickling spice placed in the top. You can start eating it in a couple of days.

If you've got a mint patch now's the time to make up some jars of mint sauce too to keep in the fridge. You can freeze the leaves as well just as they are and chop 'em up as you need 'em. Do it soon 'cos the patch'll soon be dying down for the winter and won't be back 'til next spring. Most restaurants, and I mean most restaurants, posh or ordinary, no matter how nice the roast lamb is, give you rotten mint sauce out of the jar. Tastes like TCP (what my brother Dave used to call Tom Cats' ). I don't get why so few restaurants serve fresh mint sauce. I can think of only two or three over the years I've been eating out. Bowles mint (the best) is so easy to grow, so easy to make and tastes so great you could eat it by the spoonful.

Plant it somewhere where you don't mind it multiplying like mad though, 'cos it will.

This, with roast lamb, is my favourite Sunday dinner. If you haven't got a mint patch, find a neighbour who has. They are bound to be overrun with it and will be glad to dig up a clump for you.

THIS WEEK'S IMPOUNDERABLE: DO OTHER MAMMALS SWEAT?

Some do, some don't. Dogs, for example, do not have sweat glands so if they overheat, they either seek shade or pant heavily and lose heat through their tongues. Horses, on the other hand, do sweat but because they are covered in so much hair, their sweat does not evaporate so easily and therefore they have to be cooled down (eg with a towel). But what about the pig? After all, we talk about sweating like a pig, so presumably the pig sweats a lot? In fact, pigs do not sweat. What they do to cool down is either drink lots of water or find a nice mud bath or wet patch and roll in it. The mud also helps to keep flies and mosquitoes away and acts as a sunscreen. So although they often look dirty, there is a good reason for this and contrary to what most people think, they are in fact quite fastidious and only smelly if their owners don't clean them out regularly. The fact that they eat leftovers and other stuff considered unfit for humans is again not their choice...

WISE WORDS

A goal is not always meant to be reached, it often serves simply as something to aim at. (Bruce Lee)

Rupert

And Jenny Frost
EPISODE 5

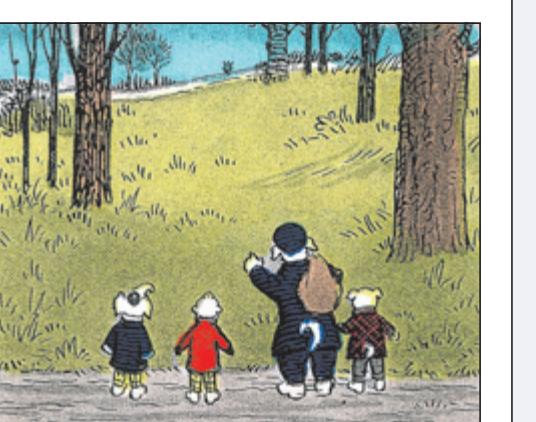

Before Algy can explain what he means there are more footsteps and the village postman comes around the corner.

"Hello, you young folk. Do you want to see something mysterious?" he asks.

"We already have, all of us!" declares Rupert. "Is your mystery the same as ours?" "Come and look," says the postman, taking them away from the houses and pointing uphill.

"See that line of snow along the top? What sort of snowstorm is it that stops in a straight line?"

The postman too strolls into range, "This way, I'll show you something strange!"

He points across some open land, "The snowstorm stopped in one straight line!"
